Fighting patriarchy with education

“We would sit on the pavement outside and wait for amma (mother) to give us dry chapatis soaked in water,” recalls a teary-eyed Mehjabeen.

The family of Mehjabeen, daughter of a daily wage mason Mohammad Raees, migrated to Janta Camp from Uttar Pradesh’s Sultanpur some two decades ago. This specific ghetto is a few miles away from Asha’s Anna Nagar slum colony. Mehjabeen along with her parents, one brother and sister, and a grandfather live altogether in a shanty no bigger than the size of a car. With a meagre and non-fixed income, that usually ranges between Rs 7000 to 8000 (£76.47–£87.40/ $99.50– $13.71) per month, their monthly household expenses are barely managed.

The Asha Ambassadors, while on a visit in search of bright students in and around the community, found a sincere Mehjabeen. Mehjabeen was intelligent but naïve. The Ambassadors knew that it is important that Mehjabeen, a class eleventh student then, should be counselled for her better future as a matter of priority. But her orthodox background was a hurdle to her to even dream of college. The Ambassadors sought the help of Asha Team and made Mehjabeen’s family understand the importance of university education. In 12th class, Mehjabeen was provided with much needed scholastic materials and made to sit for extra classes and tests at the centre.

“I had terrifying moments before the results were announced. But the emotional support I received from Asha Ambassadors is beyond words. Earlier, I was studying hard but never had a goal; with the help of Asha, I could recognise my dreams,” said 17-year-old Mehjabeen.

This year, Mehjabeen scored 96% in her 12th examination securing the highest in the subject of Home Science– 98. This would have been impossible without her hard work and assistance from the Friends of Asha and supporters. Now, she seeks to get admission to a good college so that she can realize her dream of becoming a teacher one day.

“I want to make a difference in the lives of as many students as I can. I want to become a Teacher.”

Under Asha’s Higher Education Programme, more than 2500 young people have received tertiary education. Since last year our Asha Ambassadors and Graduates have been reaching out to every bright and needy student living in the slum communities of Delhi. This endeavour has ignited the light of higher education amongst the bright students. Asha believes that where you live shouldn’t be a barrier to who you can become. We hope to continue our efforts spreading education across all the slums of Delhi. Together, we can realize our dream of educating and empowering each of the slum children of Delhi.

Let’s be united and keep donating Asha to make the lives of slum children happy and bright!
